THE ranks of the old Shanghailanders are being rapidly thinned out, says the Mercury. Another of them, and one universally respected and highly regarded, passed away on the 30 h in the person of Mr. William Saunders, who for many years was the only photographer in Shanghai and North China. Mr. Saunders came out to Shanghai on 1860 in the old paddle-steamer Lycemoon, and afterwards returned to England and learned a good deal about photography He came back with all the paraphernalls of what was in the old collodion-plate days the "black art," and made quite a goodly pile in few years taking photographs of places in Peking which have ever since been untouched by camera. He also travelled in Japan in the days of the Tycoon and the Samural, and was probably the first man to get a lens upon these bits of Japanese scenery which are now to be seen in photographs over half the world. Mi Saunders retired from business a few years age and last year went to England, whence he had only returned a few weeks, when he caught chill which developed a fatal attack of bronchitis He was a man of sterling character and leaves : host of friends to regret his demise.

FIFTY years ago the introduction of fron as a building material created a revolution in the science and set of shipbuilding. It is now certain, says Kuhlow's, that in the very near future an even more import at revolution will be created by the introduction of aluminium. At present there are in existence but five small craft constructed of this metal. Three are petroleum yachts, which we'e built at Zurich. One is a Swedish life-boat. The fifth is a yacht which is now completing for sea in Germany. Until two on three years ago the high price of aluminium collicly barred the way to its general usefulness. but the metal has since become much cheaper. and to the shipbuilder it offers so many striking advantages that, even at the comparatively high ? A CHATTY chapter in Chambers's Journal, dealing with old American newspapers, has some interesting observations on the value of news papers to the historian. We presume from the matter and method of the article that it is from the informing pen of Mr. William Andrews, F.R.H.S., of Hull, author of numerous works on the social life of the olden time. "Th only true history of a country," said Lord Macaulay, "is to be found in its news papers " Sir George Cornewall Lewis expressed his conviction that the historian of the future will find all his materials in The Times. The American historian, Mr. Bancroft, seldom sawa newspaper without drawing from it materials for his works. The story-teller often obtains from the daily and weekly press suggestive notes. Charles Reade made excellent use of the roman tic episodes recorded in the newspapers. H scrap-books, commining clippings from papers, were numerous and valuable, amongst his most cherished treasures. modern men of letters might be mentioned who are alive to the importance of preserving facts drawn from the journals of the day.
